Activity 7: Part A

Buddies before bullies

Mini had joined a new school mid-year and was struggling to keep up with the extra work she needed to do to catch up with her class.

She tried hard and got better at math and music, but found she couldn't catch up with all the art assignments, and when the tryouts for the upcoming Annual Sports Day started, she couldn't make it in any of the categories.

This made her sad and she wouldn't talk to the other kids, thinking that she wasn't cool or smart enough for them.

One day as she was trying out for the last (but her favourite) category for Sports Day, hurdle race, some of the children in her class started to boo her. She got so distracted that when the coach shouted, "Ready, steady, go!" she tripped even before she reached the first hurdle. She fell flat on her face, and that hurt!

What hurt more was watching everyone present there, laugh at her. All but one. This child was watching from a distance and ran to help Mini. His name was Anay and he used to sit at the back of the class with all the kids who chatted till the teacher asked them to focus. Mini had always thought that he was naughty and stayed away from him, but today she was surprised. He helped her up, dusted her clothes and offered her some water from his water bottle. He then told his friends to stop laughing and asked them to help out instead.

While his friends did not care – they turned around and walked away – he signalled to another girl. Mini found out later that her name was Niya.

Niya came over and took a hobbling Mini to the school nurse. Mini was crying as she felt embarrassed, but Niya firmly told her she needed to toughen up and work harder to get better at things that interested her. Mini was taken aback that someone was talking to her like that, but she felt that maybe Niya was saying the right thing.

The bell rang for art class and Mini and Niya quickly headed to class. Anay was already in class. He was trying to draw a basket and it seemed like he was erasing more than drawing. Some of the kids were sniggering at him but he kept trying. Mini sat at the desk next to him and suggested a few strokes that helped him get the basket just right.

He and their teacher were happy to see the drawing complete. The kids stopped sniggering.

Mini felt she was starting to find a few friends and finally felt happy at school.

Read the story above carefully and work on the activities below.
